Elizabeth (Liz) Larzelere is an Instructional Technologist in the Center for Excellence in Learning and Teaching at New York Chiropractic College (NYCC). Her area of focus is “empowering the user” by developing and promoting opportunities relating to the technical experience of students, faculty and administration through the use of technology in teaching and learning.

Liz has a Bachelor of Science degree in Accounting from St. John Fisher College, a certification in Distance Education from State University of West Georgia and Master in Science in Curriculum Development and Instructional Technologies.

In the past, she was a Systems Analyst at Goulds Pumps in Seneca Falls, involved in K-12 computer literacy at local schools and has been at New York Chiropractic College working with faculty, students and staff in the area of technology for the last 11 years. Liz has been on numerous committees and councils during her time at NYCC and has presented most recently at the Association of Chiropractic Colleges Conferences, Professional and Organizational Development Network in Higher Education and SUNY Conference of Instructional Technologies.
